A

Bessie Coleman was incredibly brave and extremely determined. Her dream was to become the first African-American woman to fly planes for a living. Her problem was that the year was 1920, and in the United States at that time no flight school would allow someone from her background to study. Her family was poor too, and in no position to help. Bessie saved up money by working long hours and used it to go to France to learn how to fly. Then she returned to the U.S. She toured the country giving flight lessons and performing in flight shows, and she gave talks, encouraging African Americans and women to learn how to fly. People were fascinated by her performances, and she became extremely popular both in the United States and in Europe.

"I refused to take no for an answer ... I decided African-American women should not have to experience the difficulties I had faced, so I decided to open a flying school and teach other African-American women to fly ... The air is the only place free from prejudice."

In the early twentieth century, Harriet Chalmers Adams became famous for her travels, for her articles in National Geographic magazine, and for her lecture tours, in which she showed amazing photos of the places she visited. Traveling on horseback with her husband, she spent three years visiting every country in South America. During the First World War in Europe, she spent time on the frontline, reporting the war for magazines and photographing the soldiers. She also helped start the Society of Woman Geographers, partly to support other female explorers, but mostly because she was not invited to join other clubs, which only allowed men.

"There is no reason why a woman cannot go wherever a man goes—and further. If a woman be fond of travel, if she has love of the strange, the mysterious and the lost, there is nothing that will keep her at home ... Why did women never go to the Arctic, try for one pole or the other, or [visit] unknown wildernesses? I've never ... faced a difficulty which a woman, as well as a man, could not [deal with]; never felt a fear of danger; never lacked courage to protect myself."
