READING

These days, many teenagers don't get the fresh air and exercise they need. Video games and cell phones are the main reason for this. However, kids aren't lazy. They just need to put down their games and their phones.

I think parents and teachers should encourage children to play sports or do outdoor activities such as hiking or walking. Getting fresh air is important for their health. For example, it makes them stronger, so that they don't get sick often. It also makes them feel good about themselves and keeps them happy and smiling.

Exercising inside is also good, but you won't get the benefits of fresh air. I know that playing a sport or doing exercise outside in winter is not so much fun, but if you dress for the weather, I'm sure you won't get too cold or wet. Perhaps on the days when the weather is really bad, kids can play their sports indoors, for example, in a gym or sports center. This, of course, depends on if these places are near where they live.

If a child doesn't like sports, walking is another great option, and power walking—a fast form of walking—is even better. Both are healthy activities and they don't cost much money. You just need a good pair of shoes to do them.

Joining a club is a good way to play a sport and make new friends at the same time. Even individual sports like tennis and golf can be social sports. For example, many clubs have challenge days when they put people together to play against each other, so it's easy to meet new people!
