The importance of home office space

When I first started working from home, I made many typical first-time mistakes. Although I was able to get my work done, I didn't feel like I was getting enough done and my family didn't understand my schedule—because there really wasn't one!

One mistake I made was doing my work all over the house. The kitchen, the living room, the dining room, and even my bedroom all became a workplace! My papers were everywhere and I had trouble finding things.

Another mistake was working all hours of the day. To be clear, I didn't work for sixteen hours every day! But I worked a little in the morning, some in the afternoon, and occasionally late at night. My poor family felt like they were missing a parent!

The solution was to get serious about at-home workplace design. First, I took a good long look around my house to decide where the best workplace was. In a busy household, there aren't many options. I really only had one—the basement.

Now, our basement was not a happy place! We stored old clothes, old furniture, ladders, and our old kitchen sink. I decided to clear an area near the windows, and I set up some good lighting, a very large desk, and a comfortable work chair. I finally felt like I had my own private space, and I began to look forward to work. I even put up a sign—Marcela's Design Studio!

It also helped my family understand that when I was in the basement—I mean, my studio—I was working, and they knew not to bother me. I had clear working hours and they finally knew my schedule because my new workplace allowed me to make one.
