Why are we organized?

Have you ever wondered why we organize our homes? For some, it might be obvious—things are just nicer when they're tidy. Interestingly, there is a link between being organized and having better health. Let's explore ...

Studies show that messy rooms make it harder for us to focus on daily tasks. They can even cause stress, affect our ability to see, and create other negative emotions. This is because our minds see a mess as unfinished work.

By contrast, tidying up the house gives us a sense of accomplishment—like we've reached a goal. We feel satisfied, and the process of organizing things can make us feel calm as we do it. It can take your mind off other issues in life that might cause stress, like an upcoming exam or a difficult issue at work.

Making the house look nice doesn't just have a positive effect on our minds. It can help your physical health, too. One research professor found that cleaning can be as healthy as going on a short walk. Even washing your bed sheets helps you sleep better.

Some people may feel like they don't have time to organize their stuff. They avoid it, and slowly but surely, the house becomes a mess. Here's a tip: start with five minutes of daily tidying-up. Choose one thing, like organizing mail or cleaning a tabletop. Do one task on one day, then choose a different task the following day. Do it for just five minutes, and if you like, you can increase it to ten. Small amounts of organizing have benefits. Soon enough, you'll see a positive change in your home—and your life.

10 Read the article. Then look at the sentence taken from the article. Does the sentence give facts, give opinions, or report on other people's opinions? Choose the best answer.
