A Regular Monday

Sena's alarm goes off at 6:30, and she's already thinking about the presentation she has today. She's been putting off finishing the slides for two days, and now there's no time left to wait for inspiration.

At the office, she doesn't want to wait for the elevator, so she takes the stairs instead. On her way up, she runs into Rio, who looks exhausted. He's been trying to get over a cold all week.

"Are you getting by okay?" she asks.

"Slowly," he says. "I'm just trying to get through today without falling asleep in the meeting. I looked into a few home remedies last night, but nothing's working yet."

They talk about their weekend plans while waiting for the coffee machine to finish. Sena mentions she dreams of a quiet Saturday — no meetings, no emails, just coffee and a good book.

During the meeting, Sena's boss, Marcos, doesn't agree with the new deadline, but the client won't turn down a discount, so the team has to figure something out. Sena cares about doing the project well — she took it on herself, even though nobody else wanted to.

Marcos turns to her and asks her to run the numbers by the finance team before lunch. She agrees to send the report by noon, even though she's not sure she'll get through the whole spreadsheet in time.

At lunch, she puts on her jacket and takes a short walk outside. She looks forward to the weekend more than ever. For now, though, she has to get back to her desk and put up with one more afternoon of spreadsheets.
