National treasures on fire

In September 2018, Brazil's precious National Museum was destroyed in a huge fire. Following an investigation, police experts said that the fire must have been caused by a fault in the air-conditioning unit. The museum in Rio de Janeiro was one of the oldest and most important scientific museums in the country and had one of the most valuable collections in the world. It had been located in the Imperial Palace since 1889, when the monarchy was removed from power. Many Brazilians cried when they saw the museum burning. Twenty million objects were lost, many of which cannot be replaced. But, in the following months, the staff managed to rescue thousands of pieces, including treasured items such as Luzia, the earliest human skull discovered in South America. Gradually, with the help of other museums and foreign governments, the museum is being brought back to life. Italy, one country to offer help, is lending hundreds of ancient items to the museum, including Roman statues and special wall paintings. They have also promised to provide expert help to repair damaged objects.

In 1992, a fire suddenly started in Windsor Castle, the largest lived-in castle in the world, and one of the official homes of Queen Elizabeth II of England. It is thought that the fire could have been started by a light which overheated, setting fire to a curtain nearby. Castle staff formed a human chain passing precious furniture, artwork and antiques to each other. Luckily, 300 clocks, a collection of tiny paintings and thousands of historic books and drawings from the library were saved, but many other valuable paintings and items of furniture were destroyed. You cannot buy insurance to protect royal palaces like Windsor, as the buildings and the collections inside are too valuable, so a debate followed about who should pay for the repairs of the castle. It's actually owned by the state, not the monarch, but some politicians said that the general public shouldn't have to pay, and that the queen should pay for the repairs herself. In the end, the queen opened parts of Buckingham Palace, her London home, to the public for the first time, charging £8 for an entry ticket. The money raised paid for most of the castle's repairs, and the queen paid the rest. The final cost was about £36 million (the equivalent of over £70 million today).

The Gran Teatre del Liceu was not the most beautiful building in Barcelona or the oldest, but when a fire destroyed it in 1994, people were extremely disappointed. For 150 years, the opera house had been at the centre of Barcelona's social life. Many generations of singers, including José Carreras, had started their careers on its stage. So, politicians promised that the Liceu would be rebuilt. It wasn't the first time that the theatre had been destroyed by fire. It had happened before in 1861, with the opera house reopening just one year later. This time it took five years for the theatre to open again. When it did in 1999, it looked the same, but the new theatre was now an opera house for the 21st century. The old building was still there, but impressive modern technology had been installed.

11 Read the newspaper article. Do the statements relate to the National Museum in Brazil (NM), Windsor Castle in England (WC) or the Gran Teatre In Barcelona (GT)? There may be more than one answer.

- Royalty had lived in the building. NM / WC / GT
- People disagreed about who should pay for the repairs. NM / WC / GT
- Fire had destroyed the building before. NM / WC / GT
- Employees helped to protect items during the fire. NM / WC / GT
- The new building was more up-to-date than the original one. NM / WC / GT
- The public felt emotional when the disaster happened. NM / WC / GT
- Employees helped to find lost items after the fire. NM / WC / GT
