How old for housework?

At what age should children do housework?

Today, Alex talks about when he started to help with housework. Then, our housework expert Jordan explains what age she thinks children can start doing household chores at home.

Alex says, 'When I was little, I loved spending time with my parents, and when they were doing things in the house, I wanted to do the same. At age four, I used to help do the laundry, but I couldn't hang out the clothes until I was much taller! Also, I had a toy brush because I saw my parents sweeping the floor and I wanted to do it too! I think children should start helping from an early age, my little sister is four and she has to help clear the table. My parents also help to teach her to clear away her toys and keep her room clean.'

Jordan, our housework expert, agrees, 'As they get older, children should have more duties in the home. In many homes, by the age of seven, children have to take out the trash, feed the goldfish, and water the plants; I think most children are happy to do a little bit of housework and many feel satisfied that they are helping in the house.'

She continues, 'Obviously there are some chores you can't do until you're older – things like cutting the grass, you need a heavy machine and it's quite tiring, or ironing – but it's a good idea that parents involve children in housework early on. I also think that if children do housework, then they are more interested in helping at home generally and as a result they become more responsible adults.'
