Jensen Huang, the CEO of Nvidia, a company worth about $4.5 trillion, admitted on Sunday, November 8, that he had an extramarital affair. In a letter to employees he said he had been unfaithful to his wife and apologized to his family. He did not name the other person.

On October 29, The New York Times reported that US officials had spent more than a year looking into Huang's close relationship with Alice Huang, who is not related to him. Reports link her to Megaspeed, a Singapore-based data center company that became one of Nvidia's largest customers, buying about $4.8 billion in equipment. Photos cited by CNN show the two together at events as early as 2024, but photos show association, not wrongdoing.

According to the reports, US intelligence officials suspect that she gathered information for Beijing. None of this has been proven in public, no charges have been reported, and there is no public evidence that Huang knowingly shared confidential information. China's foreign ministry calls the claims groundless, and Megaspeed denies wrongdoing. Singapore says it never described her as under investigation for intelligence links, although it is still looking into Megaspeed.

Nvidia's board has opened an independent investigation. It says it has no reason to believe that national security or company secrets were compromised, and Huang remains CEO. A proposed shareholder lawsuit claims that investors were misled, but no court has ruled on it.

President Trump called Huang an honorable person and said he had not heard that Huang had done anything wrong. Three Republican House chairmen asked Huang to appear on November 18, and Senator Elizabeth Warren, a Democrat, wants answers too. On Monday, Nvidia's shares fell more than 4 percent, erasing about $190 billion in market value.

The case reaches beyond one person's private life: Nvidia's chips are central to the AI industry, and Washington limits some sales to China. One analyst said the news would increase scrutiny of those sales, which Huang has pushed for. Nvidia reports results on November 17.
